This pattern varied from region to region. People of French origin were the majority in Canada East. In Canada West and the Maritimes, people of British origin were predominant. In the Prairies, First Nations people and the Métis were the largest groups. There were also some British and French fur traders living there. In British Columbia, the largest groups were people of British and American origin who had been attracted by a series of gold rushes.

Men and their families waited for immigrants to get on the train. There is a small building in the background.

Key Words
gold rush: a period of time when people went to a place to look for gold.
immigrant: a person who has moved to a new country to live there.

Environmental History

Diversifying Crops
In the early 1800s, potatoes were the main food in Ireland. A strain of potato known as the "hungry" was the most popular because it gave a high yield. In 1845, a fungus infected the larger potato. For three years in a row, the potato crop failed. In the resulting famine, thousands of Irish people died. Others emigrated to North America. It was an environmental disaster that might have been avoided by growing a wider variety of crops.

The Great Migration
One factor that contributed to the population diversity was a mass migration of people from Europe in the 1840s and 1850s. Poverty and food shortages drove thousands of people to emigrate, many coming to what is now Canada. This increased the ethnic diversity of British North America. People from the Netherlands and Germany settled here. Others came here from Ireland because of the Great Irish Famine, when disease destroyed the country's main crop, potatoes. Many of the Irish who came were Roman Catholics and were looked upon with suspicion in their homelands. Many of them were poor and needed to move in order to survive. You will read more about the Irish immigrants in Chapter 2.
